	By myself, I am able	to relate a true tale, tell of journies,	how I through days of toil, time of hardship	often suffered,
	bitter grief of heart	have endured,
	experienced in the ship	many places of care, 5
	terrible rolling of the waves.	There it often took me narrow night-watch	at the ship's prow then it by cliffs drove.	My feet were pressed by cold,	bound by frost, by cold fetters,	there then sorrow lamented 10
	hot around the heart;	hunger within tore the sea-weary spirit.	The man for whom it befalls most happily on land	does not know how I inhabited the ice-cold sea	wretchedly anxious,
	in the winter inhabited	via tracks of an exile 15
	of loving kinsmen deprived,
	hung around with icicles;	hail flew in showers.
	There I heard naught	except the roaring sea, ice-cold water.	Sometimes the song of the swan
	I made to serve for my entertainment,	gannet's laughter 20
	and curlew's voice	instead of the laughter of men, seagull singing	instead of mead-drinking.
	There storms pounded the rocky cliff	there a tern answered them icy-feathered;	very often an eagle screeched speckled-winged;	not any protecting kinsmen 25
	desolate heart	could comfort.
	Therefore he believes little,	he [for] whom life's delight has been experienced in cities,	few evil fortunes, proud and wanton with wine,	how I often weary in the sea-way	must wait.

[2] hlimman sæ — accusative + infinitive, so "roaring sea" or "sea roaring"

[3] ne æniġ hlēomæga — partative genitive

The shadow of the night grew dark, it snowed from the north, rime bound the earth, hail fell on the earth, coldest of corns. Therefore, now thoughts of the heart batters me, that I myself, high seas, would have experienced the tumult of salt-waves;

heart's desire urges time and again the spirit to set out, that I far from here would visit a land of foreigners.
Because there is not any one across the earth so proud nor in his gifts so good, nor in youth so brave, nor in his deeds so bold, nor whose lord [is] so friendly to him that he ever in his sea-journey did not have anxiety, as to how the Lord will treat him.

His thought is not of harp nor of recieving rings from a lord, nor in pleasure in a woman nor in hope of worldly things nor about anything else, except about the rolling of the waves, but always has longing he who is eager for the sea.

Groves come into flower, cities become fair, meadows become beautiful, the world hurries onward; all then admonishes spirit's eager heart to journey, which so intends on ocean paths to go far.

In like manner the cookoo admonishes in its very mournful voice, summer's sentinel sings, proclaims sorrow bitter into the heart. That the man does not know, favor-blessed man, what some suffer that paths of exile lay most widely.

Therefore now my heart wanders beyond the breast, my inner man through sea-flood over whale's territory roams widely, earth's surfaces, comes afterwards to me eager and greedy, the lone flier cries, whets onto the path of the whale spirit unhindered [4] mæla ġehwylċe — dative of time [5] elþēodiġra — el == foreign, þēod == people [6] tō þæs — "to this extent" -> "so" [7] blōstmum nimað — lit. "Groves take blossoms", but more ModE idiomatically "Groves come into flower" [8] ġeomran — Note that -ran indicates a comparative here. (I passed over this at first without seeing it.) Note that it is weak, yet there is no other word that takes the grammatial weight. Thust his is comparative, here, but in an emphatic role rather than a true comparative. So "very mournful", not "more mournful"

[9] ānfloga — ānfloga here refers to ġēac, the cookoo. I had assumed it was the heart or spirit, but we've got "eorþan scēatas" which is the domain of the cookoo? Definitely the subject of this sentence is the spirit of the seafarer, so this was confusing to me and I'm not nor [can he] swallow sweetness nor feel pain, nor stir a hand nor think with his mind.

Although his brother may want to strew the grave with gold for his brother, by deeds to bury along with various treasures beside the dead man that he may wish to go with him, the gold that he hides before while he still lives here cannot be for the help to the soul which is full of sin in the face of the terror of God.
Great is the awe of God before which the earth turns herself away;
who established the hard lands, surfaces of earth and the heavens above.
Foolish is he who does himself not dread his Lord; death arrives unexpected for him.
Blessed is he who lives humbly: the grace of the heavens comes for him, the Creator establishes for him the spirit therefore he should believe in his.
A man should restrain the headstrong heart and keep it on (firm) foundations, and be trustworthy among men, clean in his ways; should act with every man with restraint in his affection towards a friend and in his malice against an enemy. though who he might him want full of fire or this friend he has made consumed by a funeral-pyre. Providence is stronger, the Creator mightier than any man's conception.
Let us think about where we might have a home, and then consider how we may come thither, and we then also should strive, so that we too should be allowed there in the eternal happiness, where life is belonging to in the love of the Lord, joy in the heavens. That should be thanks to the Holy one because he rewards us, Prince of heaven, eternal Lord, for all time. Amen.

About this text

Ever since the Anglo-Saxons migrated by ship from the Continent to the isle of Britain, Englishmen seem to have been more aware than most people of the importance and fascination of the sea and seafaring. One aspect of the seafaring life which has always captured the attention of people everywhere is the paradoxical state of mind called "sea fever" – that irresisible call fo the sea felt by experienced seamen who may on some occasions complain bitterly about the pains and trials of sea travel, but will sign on for another voyage when the opportunity presents itself. Poems and novels in many periods have treated this subject, but none has done so more convincingly than the Old English poetic monologue _The Seafarer_, which searches so deeply the thoughts and feelings of one Anglo-Saxon sailor that the poet Ezra Pound claims to have discovered in this work "the English national chemical."

But impressive as it is in its treatment of the physical and psychological rigors of the seafaring life, the poem is about much more than that. Indeed, most of the latter half of the monologue does not mention the sea but rather is concerned with the impermanence of earthly riches and worldy fame and th eimportance of fixing one's attention on the world to come, where judgement will be severe and the rewards will be lasting. The juxtaposition of the seafarer's account of his involvement with the sea and his concerns for the future life is startling, but it is not incomprehensible. First he describes dramatically his sufferings at sea while men on land live in comfort, but he simultaneously expresses his disdain for the landlubber's life and his preference for the trials and challenges of seafaring. But then (II. 64-6) his thought shift from considerations of sea voyages to his ultimate goal of union with the Lord in Heaven. To achieve this higher goal, one must forgo the pomps and joys of earthly existence and the fleeting benefits of gold and worldly goods at large. Just as the seafaring man is willing to deny himself the pleasures of life on land in order to take up the hard challenges of the sea, the devout Christian must be willing to renounce the pleasures of the flesh in order to arrive at his heavenly destination. [...] Key words like _dryhten_ and _lond_ take on second meanings as the initial monologue of the seafarer is placed in juxtaposition with this broader conception of man's voyage through life to an ultimate destination. [...] if we can all accept the fact that seafaring men will forgo the pleasures of life on liand for the obscure enticements of a dangerous ocean journey, is it unreasonable for Christianity to require renunciation of some earthly delights for the goal of eternal salvation
