A certain very learnéd monk came from the south over the sea from Saint Benedict's place in King Æthelred's day to Archbischop Dunstan three years before he died, and the monk was called Abbo. Then they were in conversation until that Dunstan explained about Saint Edmund, just as Edmund's swordbearer [had] explained it to King Æthelstan, when Dunstan was then a young man and the swordbearer was an elderly man. Then the monk set down all the narrative in a book and after, when then the book came to us four years later, then we translated it into English, as it stands hereafter [in the following pages]. Then the monk Abbo in two years returned home to his monastery and immedately was seated as the abbot in the same monastery.

Edmund the blesséd, king of the East Angles, was wise and worthy and always honored the almighty God with noble customs. He was humble and virtuous and remained so resolute that he did not want to yield to shameful sins, nor on either side deviated from his good practices, but was always mindful of their true lore, "You are set up as captain? Do not you exalt yourself, but be among the people as if you were one of them." He was generous to beggars and widows, just like a father, and with benevolence instructed his people always to righteousness and punished the savage ones and blessedly lived in the true faith.

It came to pass then at last that the Danish people set out with a Danish army ravaging and slaughtering far and wide throuhgout the land as is their custom. In the fleet were the foremost captains Hingwar and Hubba, united by the Devil, and they arrived in the land of the Northumbrians with ships and laid waste to the land and slew the people. Then Hingwar returned east with his ships and Hubba remained in the land of the Northumbrians, after a victory won with cruelty. Hingwar then came rowing to the East Anglians, in the year that prince Alfred was one and twenty years, he who, king of the

[1] ġelǣred — Here is a past participle used as an adjective for "munuc (monk)": learnéd

[2] þrim ġēarum — ġearum is dative here because it is an expression of time

[3] forealdod — Another past particple used as an adjective for "man": elderly

[4] āwende wē — This really should be āwendon (past indicative plural)

[5] wearð sōna tō abbode ġeset — did he become the abbot?

[6] ne on nāþre healfe hē ne āhylde his þēawas — lit. "nor on neither side he did not deviate from his good practices"

[7] ac bēo betwux mannum swā swā ān man of him — lit. "but be between people just as one person of them."

[8] welwillendnysse — this is a "calque", in which each part of a source language compound word is translated into the equivalent parts in the destination language. So here, welwillendnysse is wel + willend + nysse. wel == good, willend is pres. part of willan (wanting) and nysse = making an abstract noun from a verbal. Now look at the source, benevolence (latin). bene == good, vol ~= wanting, ence, nouning.

[9] ġewunnenum siġe mid wælhrēownysse — this is an "absolute" phrase in that it stands independently of the rest of the sentence. The "abative" is the case in Latin that is like the dative in OE.

Þā ġewende sē ærendraca arodlīċe āweġ and ġemētte be weġe þone wælhrēowan Hingwar mid eallre his fyrde, fūse tō Ēadmunde, and sæde þām ārlēasan hū him ġeandwyrd wæs. Hingwar þā bebēad mid bylde þām sciphere þæt hī þæs cyninges ānes ealle cēpan sceoldon, þe his hæse forseah, and hine sōna bindan. Hwæt þā Ēadmund cyning, mid þām þe Hingwar cōm, stōd innan his healle, þæs Hælendes ġemyndig, and āwearp his wæpnu:

West Saxons, will later become renowned; and the aforesaid Hingwar quickly, just like a wulf on land, stalked and slew the people, men and women and the unwitting children, and tormented the innocent Christians to their disgrace.

Soon afterwards, he then sent to the king a boastful message that he must yield to his service if he cared about his life. The messenger came then to King Edmund and Hingwar's message to him immediately commanded: "Hingwar our king, brave and victorious at sea and on land has control over many people and came now quickly to land here with the army so that he here would have winter quarters with his company. Now he commands you to share your hidden gold hoards and your ancestors' treasure quickly with him, and that you be his underking, if you want to be alive, because you do not have the might that could be able to withstand him."

Lo! Then King Edmund summoned a certain bishop who was then nearest to him, and with him thought how he should answer the cruel Hingwar. Then the bishop was afraid because of the sudden ill fortune and for the king's life, and said that it seemed good counsel to him that he should submit to that which Hingwar commanded. The king then fell silent and looked to the ground and finally said to the noble one, "Alas! You bishop, the poor people of the land are reduced to disgrace, and now [it] must be dearer to me that I would fall in battle, provided that my people are allowed to possess their homeland"; and the bishop said, "Oh! you beloved king, your people lie slain and you do not have the support so that you would be able to fight, and the sailors will come and you will be bound alive, except you save your spirit with flight, or you save yourself in that you yield to him." Then said King Edmund just as though he was very brave, "This I desire and wish with all my heart [high spirits], that I for one do not survive after my beloved thegns who in their bed were, with children and wives, suddenly slain by these pirates. It was never usual for me that I would prepare to flee [of flight], but I very much wanted to perish if I must for my own country; and the Almighty God knows that I would not want to withdraw ever from his worship, nor from his true love, whether I die, or whether I live."

After these words he returned to the messenger who Hingwar [had] sent to him and said to him, unafraid, "Verily you would be worthy of death now, but I would not want to befoul my clean hands with your vile blood, because I follow Christ, who so set an example for us; and I gladly want to be slain by you, if God so preordained it. Go now very quickly and say to your cruel master, 'Edmund will never yield in life to Hingwar, heathen commander, except he submit first to Christ the Saviour with faith in this land.'"

Then the messenger immediately went away and found by road the bloodthirsty Hingwar with all his army, hastening for Edmund, and said to the dishonorable one how he was answered. Hingwar then, with arrogance, commanded the great heathen army that they all should sieze the one king, he who rejected his command, and bind him soon. Alas! Then King Edmund, amid those who came with Hingwar, stood in his hall, mindful of the Saviour, and cast down his weapon; wishing to imitate Christ's example, who forbade Peter to contend with weapons against the fierce Jews. Lo! The wicked ones then bound Edmund and mocked [him] ignominiously and beat [him] with clubs, and later led the faithful king to a certain tree firmly rooted in the earth and tied him thereto with hard bands, and afterwards beat him for a long time with scourges; and he always cried out between the strokes with true faith to Christ the Saviour; and the heathens then because of his faith were furiously angry, because he called out to Christ as a help for him. They shot then with missles, as of a game for them, too, until that he was all covered with their missles, like a hedgehog's bristles, just as Sebastian was. Then Hingwar saw, the wicked pirate, that the noble king did not want to forsake Christ, but with resoulte faith he ever cried out; commanded him then to be beheaded, and the heathens did so. While he then yet was crying out to Christ, then the heathens dragged the saintly one to the fatal stroke and with one blow struck the head from him, and his soul went blesséd to Christ. There was a certain man nearby, kept by God, hidden from the heathens, who heard all this and told it afterwards just as we tell it here.

Lo! The Viking band went afterwards to ship and hid the holy Edmund's head in the thick brambles so that it could not be buried. Then after a time, after they were departed, the people of the land came to where the remnant was then, where their lord's corpse lay without head, and were very sorrowful for his death in their hearts, and especially that they did not have the head for the body. Then the witness who saw it afterwards said that the pirates kept the head with them, and it appeared to him, just as it was completely true, that they hid the head in the forest somewhere. They then went all together to the forest, searching everywhere, throughout bushes and brambles, if they anywhere were able to find the head. It was also a great miracle that a certain wolf was sent with God's guidance to defend the head against the other wild beasts throughout the day and night. They then went searching and continually crying out, as it is usual for those who often go into the woods, "Where are you now, friend?", and the head answered them, "Here! Here! Here!", and so constantly cried out, answering them as often as any of them called out, until that they came thorough all the sounds to him. Then lay the gray wolf who guarded the head and had clasped the head with [12] wōdlīċe — Wōdan (Odin) and wōdlīċe share wōd – angry. Odin is the "angry god", and is the patron of berserkers.

[13] him tō fultume — note that if we write this as "to help him" it makes it sound like help is a verb, when it is in fact a noun, thus to be clear we need to write it "as a help to him", making "him" the ethical dative.

[14] behēafdian — accusative + infinitive construction

[15] wæs ful sōð — here this is a substantivized "sōþ", normally an adjective but used as a noun. Has to be an adj. because "ful" is an adverb, and adverbs don't modify nouns.

[16] ān wulf wearð — Why a wolf here? The wolf is part of the trio of animals related to conflict and war: ravens, wolves and eagles. They come to devour the slain after battle. But here we have God's inversion of this motif by making the wolf "tame" and protect Edmund's head, showing in some sense his power overcoming the Danes.

[17] ofwundrode — This is a past participle used as an nominitive plural masculine adjective. Why?

Then they were astonished of the wolf's guardianship, and carried the holy head home with them, giving thanks to the Almighty for all his miracles; but the wolf followed forth together with the head, until that they came to the village, as if he were tame, and returned afterwards to the forest again. The people of the country then afterwards applied the head to the holy body and buried him as best they could as if in haste, and erected the church soon tover him.

Then afterwards for a time, after many years, when the invasion ceased and peace was granted to the afflicted people, then they got together and constructed a certain church worthy for the saintly one, because there became miracles constantly at his grave by the chapel where he was was buried. Then they wanted to carry with public honor the holy body and lay [it] in the church. Then [it] was a great wondrous thing that he was whole just as he were alive again, with a clean body, and his neck was healed, which before was cut through, and [there] was also one red, silken thread around his neck, as evidence to men [of] how he was slain. Also likewise the wounds which the bloodthirsty heathens caused with frequent missles into his body, were healed by means of the heavenly God; and he lies just as sound until this present day, awaiting the ressurection and the everlasting glory. His body reveals to us, which lies undecayed, that he lived without wantonness here on earth and went by means of a pure life to Christ.

A certain widow dwelt, named Oswyn, by the holy grave with prayers and fasts for many years afterwards, Each year, she wanted to shear the saint, and cut his fingernails neatly with love and in a coffer keep them as relics in an altar.

Then the people of the land honored the saint with faith, and Bishop ThéSSodred enriched the church exceedingly with gifts in gold and in silver as an honor for the saint. Then at a certain time eight wretched thieves came on one night to the honorable, saintly one: they wanted to steal the treasures which people had brought thither, and found out with cunning how they could come in. One struck firmly with a sledge-hammer on the hasps, one with their file filed around [them], one also delved under the the doors with a shovel, one with their ladder wanted to open the window, but

[18] ġeswenċtan — past participle used as an adjective

[19] ġebedhūse — ġebedhūs – ġebed == prayer, hūs == house

[20] ġehāten — this is a past participle acting as an adjective, modfying "widewe"

[21] wolde efsian ǣlċe ġēare þone sanct — to cut his hair to take as a relic

[22] þearle — Isaac says that þearle can be thought of as just an intensifier, so at some level we can make it mean something appropriate for the context. Bosworth-Tollar says "This word, as does swíþe (q. v.), tends to become an adverb of degree rather than one of manner or quality; where it qualifies words denoting pain, effort, or the like, it may be considered as keeping much of its old force, but even there it is used to translate Latin words marking degree; while in the case of words which do not convey such an idea, it becomes equivalent to very, very much, exceedingly, and the like. "

[23] þām sancte — Ethical dative: "for the saint"

[24] ēagðȳrl — ēag-þȳrl: ēag = "eye"; þȳrl is something like "hole" so "eye-hole". Compare with the ModE "nostril" – notice the tril is related to þȳrl, so nos-tril "nose-hole"

[25] þæt sē hālga wer hī wundorliċe ġeband — This is a clarifying clause for the previous clause – it is why the thieves fared miserably: the saint bound them

[26] ealle — Accusative + infinitive construction again

they labored in futility and fared so miserably, because the holy man wonderfully bound them, each as he stood struggling with a tool, so that none of them could commit the crime, nor could they move from there, but stood so until morning. This then people wondered at how the criminals hung, one on a ladder, one stooped in digging, and each in his work was bound fast. Then they were all brought to the bishop and he commanded them all to be hanged on a high gallows, but he was not mindful how the merciful God said through his prophet these words which here stand: eos qui ducuntur ad mortem eruere ne cesses "They who men set to death, always deliver them out"; and besides the holy canons forbid the ordained ones, and bishops and priests, to be numbered among thieves, because it does not befit them [who] are chosen by God to serve, that they must be a party to any man's death, if they are the Lord's retainers. After then, later, Bishop Théodred looked at his book: he repented with lamentation that he should set down so cruel a judgment on the wretched thieves, and was sorry for it ever after until his life's end, and he earnestly asked the people that they would fast with him for three full days, entreating the Almighty that he ought to have mercy on him.

In the land was a certain man, called Leofstan, powerful in the world and stupid before God. He rode to the saintly one with much arrogance, and very insolently commanded the holy saint to appear for him, whether he were whole; but just as quickly as he saw the saint's body, then he immediately went mad, and roared horribly, and miserably ended with an evil death. This is similar to that which the holy Pope Gregory reported in his account about the holy Lawrence, who lies dead in Rome – that men always wanted to behold how he would lay, both good and evil; but God stopped them, as because a group of seven men together died a violent death in the viewing there. Then the others ceased to look on the martyr with human foolishness. Many wonders we heard in vernacular language about the holy Edmund, which we here do not want to set down in writing, but everyone knows them. In this saintly one it is clear, and in such others, that God almighty is able to raise up the whole person from earth then on the day of judgement, He Who keeps Edmund's body whole until the great day, although he should come from earth. Valued is the place on because of the worthy saint, so that it would honor the man, and should provide [it] well with God's clean servants in Christ's service, because the holy one is more

[27] eos qui ducuntur ad mortem eruere ne cesses — "Do not fail to release those who are led to death." (Proverbs 24:11)

[28] ġehādodum — past part used as an noun; a substativised adjective?

[29] On þām lande wæs sum man Lēofstān ġehāten rīċe for worulde and unwittiġ for Gode . Sē rād tō þām hālgan mid rīċċetere swīðe and hēt him ætēowian orhlīċe swīðe þone hālgan sanct hwæþer hē ġesund wære ac swā hraðe swā hē ġeseah þæs sanctes līchaman þā āwēdde hē sōna and wælhrēowlīċe grymetode and earmlīċe ġeendode yfelum dēaðe — Issac says "sounds Lovecraftian". I fully agree.

[30] hī — hī here is singular feminine (hīe typically), and this refers back to sēo stow.

[31] þēowum — "should provide it well with God's clean servants" – we should staff the burial place with monks, priests and lay people to care for it.

[32] þonne — þonne and þá differ in force; the former is used where the time of an action is indefinite, and is found with the future, the indefinite present and the indefinite past; the latter is used where a definite action has taken place wundru ġeworhte æt heora byrġenum, for ðan þe hī ne ġelȳfað on þone lifgendan[34] Crīst, ac Crīst ġewutelað mannum hwær sē sōða ġelēafa is, þonne hē swylċe wundru wyrcð þurh his hālgan wīde ġeond þās eorðan. Þæs him sȳ wuldor ā mid his heofonliċan Fæder and þām Hālgan Gāste. Amen.

[33] sylfum — Ælfriċ is referring here to the Jews washing their hands of Jesus after Pontius Pilate condemns Jesus to be crucified.

glorious than men can imagine.

The English people are not deprived of the Lord's saints, rather in the land of the English lie such holy ones as this saintly king, and Cuthbert the blesséd, and Æthelrith of Ely, and also her sister, sound in bodies, as a confirmation of the faith. There are also many others among the holy English people who make many miracles (just as it widely known) as praise to the Almighty, who they believed in. Christ makes known to people through his most famous holy one that he is Almighty God who likewise makes wonders, although that the poor Jews utterly forsook him, because they are cursed, just as they wished for himself. No wonders could be performed at their burial places, becuase they do not believe in the living Christ, but Christ shows to people where the true belief is, then he likewise performs wonders through his holy ones widely throughout the earth. Therefore glory be unto him forever with his heavenly Father and the Holy Sprit. Amen.

[34] lifgendan — pres. part. as an accusative singular masculine adjective

About this text

Ælfric wrote a series of more than thirty "Lives of Saints" and included more saint's lives in his two series of "Catholic Homilies." Other Anglo-Saxon writers have left us many more specimens in this genre, some in verse and some in prose. The medieval saint's life was a highly conventional form concerned not so much with presenting actual biography as with suppying inspirational examples of Christian lives well lived and of God's power revealed through the sometimes miractulous accomplishments of His most devoted followers. Since saint's lives ofthen include heathen violence, Christian heroism, and supertnatural events, they can be lively and entertaining as well as exemplary. [...]

St. Edmund was a native English saint, a king of East Anglia who was slain by heathen Vikings on 20 Nov 869. Ælfric's account of St. Edmund is characteristic of the genre: after giving his source for the narrative [...] he describes King Edmund's exemplary qualities – his piety, his charity, and his kindness to his people [...]. Then there is a detailed account of his martyrdom, this being the culminating event of his holy life [...]. The long, final section of the narrative tells of the disposition of the dead saint's body and of the miracles which occurred before and after his burial. The miracles are carefully recorded because these provide divine verification of Edmund's sainthood. The miracle of the protective wolf, for example is important witness to the fact of the saint's charismatic power extended even into the animal realm of GOd's kingdom, a common proof of saintliness. Also, Ælfric explains, the miracles reveal God's power and presence in Anglo-Saxon England, an important domestication of the conventional Christian verities.

At the beginning of his account, Ælfric tells us that his source is a Latin narrative by Abbo of Fleury, a French monk who had learned the story on a visit to England and recorded it in his "Passio Sancti Eadmundi." But Ælfric's Old English rendering is far more than a mechanical translation. He removes Abbo's elaborate rhetorical flourishes, shortens the speeches, and makes the narrative more brisk. His most daring innovation is the prose style he uses. After giving the introduction in sober, utilitarian prose [...] Ælfric shifts into alliterative prose, an ornamental style he devised early in his career and used in many of his works. Alliterative prose consists of four-stressed units bound by alliteration. Ælfric borrowed these features from Old English poetry, which is composed in long lines with four stresses and alliteration. The difference between Ælfric's prose and Old English verse is that he avoids the distinctive vocabulary characteristic of verse and ignores the strictly ordered stress patterns of verse. But alliterative prose is sufficiently similayr to verse that modern editors usually print it in verse lines like poetry. [...]
